OIA Skills Feedback Report

Calvin MINANG

Introduction

Thank you for taking the time to complete the HSBC Online Immersive Assessment (OIA).

We hope you have enjoyed this opportunity to learn more about the varied work we do at HSBC, across our different roles and global locations. We would like to provide you with some feedback on your responses to the assessment and some developmental suggestions to help you make the most of your potential.

Please remember that this report only explores the skills that we have identified as being important to deliver success in roles at HSBC. There are many more skills you may have that have not been included in this assessment, so some of your key skills and areas for development may not be covered in this report. Everyone has a unique combination of skills they are able to apply in a variety of organisations and careers.

We encourage you to watch the video highlighted below to learn how our graduates and interns used their OIA feedback report to support their self-development in the selection process, at university and in everyday life.

Understanding your OIA feedback report

In this report, you will find:

Your Key Skills: These are the areas that you scored the highest in across the assessment. We will provide some developmental tips to take these further.

Your Potential Area for Development: This is your lowest-scoring area within the assessment. We will share some suggestions for how to further improve this for the future, if you choose to.

These results are based on your responses across the OIA, irrespective of your overall score, and are not based on comparing your responses with anyone else's. This report does not contain the results of your application with us, which will be communicated to you separately. Please note that all candidates will receive a feedback report regardless of whether they are successful or unsuccessful.

Your Key Skills

This section gives you feedback on the areas that we identified as your key skills in relation to roles at HSBC.

Works Inclusively

Your results suggest that one of your top skills is Works Inclusively.

You are likely to be the type of person who strongly values diversity and different perspectives that promote an environment of openness, honesty and collaboration. You are likely to engage respectfully with stakeholders at all levels and tend to include people, thriving when working in a culture that values, respects and supports others.

Opportunities to develop this skill further…

- Along with gathering the perspectives of others, think about how those perspectives relate to the wider goals and objectives that you or the team are aiming to achieve. Use those perspectives to ensure that you are always working towards those wider goals and objectives.

- Seek opportunities to get involved in events that promote diversity and inclusion. This could be by taking part in outreach programmes or supporting specific networking groups. You may even want to take the time to find out what is considered respectful in different cultures or countries.

- Consider how you can help others see the value of working in diverse teams. Encourage others to seek out and react positively to views different from their own, ensuring that everyone respects and recognises the value of other people’s perspectives. Speak up when you feel people are not being respectful to others.

Take care...

- While it is great that you value and encourage diversity, and often consider the views and perspectives of others, do not forget to make sure that you also share your own perspective. Use your judgement for when you think others would benefit from hearing what you have to say.

Collaboration

Your results suggest that one of your top skills is Collaboration.

You are likely to be the type of person who feels energised when you achieve goals through teamwork and are able to consistently leverage the expertise of others to deliver the best results.

Opportunities to develop this skill further…

- Build on your natural skill in collaboration by offering your support to develop relationships within and across teams. This will enhance your own expertise and make colleagues work together more effectively.

- Learn to identify when someone in your team is being overlooked or may need your support. Ensure that you look for ways to actively encourage their contributions within the group. Listen to their perspectives to understand the value they feel they can bring, and seek to develop a trusting relationship with them that enables you to support them in the best possible way.

- Reflect on any past experiences where you have found it difficult to work with someone. Why was it difficult? What could you do to overcome this if you have to work with someone similar in future? How could you form a productive working relationship?

Take care...

- While it is great that you are highly collaborative, too much collaboration can lead to project inefficiencies, groupthink and diluted personal responsibility. Exercise good judgement when deciding which aspects of projects require collaboration and which components you can take care of independently.

Integrity

Your results suggest that one of your top skills is Integrity.

You are likely to be the type of person who is guided by your values and acts in accordance with doing the right thing. You may feel energised when you make decisions that you believe are right. You are unlikely to be afraid to speak up when you think there is a better way of doing something, or if you think there is a problem.

Opportunities to develop this skill further…

- Not everyone will be as rule-oriented and accountable as you are. You are therefore likely to be well positioned to guide others towards being more accountable for their actions, especially when mistakes are made.

- You may be well suited to a role in the team that involves reminding others of rules and ethics and the importance of adhering to these. Challenge yourself to share this knowledge with others.

- Consider a time when you acted in an ethical manner, even though it was challenging at the time. What about the situation did you find challenging, and how effective was your response? Reflect on this and use it for your development going forward.

Take care...

- While it is great that you always act in accordance with what you believe is right, make sure that you understand why a decision has been made and appreciate that others may have different perspectives from you.

Your Potential Area for Development

This section gives you feedback on which area we identified as the one for development, of those that were included in the assessment.

This is likely to be an area in which you perform less well, or one that you may not enjoy doing as much as your top skills. Please note that this should not be interpreted as a weakness – it is simply the lowest-scoring area that was assessed.

Learning Agility

Your results suggest that your area for development is Learning Agility.

You may prefer to rely on your existing knowledge and skills when faced with new situations, rather than continuously seeking out new information. You are likely to require more time to reflect on what you have learned before you are ready to apply it in practice.

Opportunities to develop this area further…

- Try using different ways to engage your attention with what you are learning. This may help your process and help you absorb the new information. Think about changing the way information is presented. Make use of different layouts, colour coding and images instead of text to make it memorable and keep it interesting.

- Develop the habit of summarising the key messages of everything you read. When you read, pay extra attention to the message of the text. What action might be taken because of it? Asking these questions regularly will help you to understand the key parts of everything you read.

- You should also get into the habit of reviewing what went well and identifying things that you could do differently after every project or learning experience you have. There is plenty to be learned from reviewing your successes as well as your challenges.
